Access Overview

This is a dance show with a strong audio-component, including live singing and some spoken words. For blind and low-vision audiences interested, a short descriptive introduction that orients patrons to the scenographic elements and the choreographic intentions will be made available no later than Jan 24. Reach out to access@pushfestival.ca for more information.

How to Experience

When you enter to see Kamwe Kamwe, you will see the stage covered with sand and crisscrossed with many elastics. People who are sensitive to airborne particles are encouraged to sit further from the stage and/or wear a mask, because some dust will be created as the dancers move in the sand.

After a short curtain speech, the show will begin.

This show is from Zimbabwe. The performance evokes experiences of oppression, exclusion, and resilience. These themes are expressed through choreography, live singing, and projected images, rather than literal or graphic depiction. The intention is to highlight injustices while creating space for collective healing, reflection, and the affirmation of equality and justice.

The tone is serious and the audience tends to have a quiet, focused energy. There is no specific story to worry about trying to follow or exactly understand. You are invited to let the sounds, images and movements wash over you and to reflect on the feelings it produces in you.
